

HELLO WORLD

week 10 reflection

monday mini-project

This week seems like its been going on for ages and I can hardly remember monday's mini project. It was pretty similar to the group project from last week and I was comfortable with that assignment so this assignment was very doable. I prefer working alone on a project more than working in teams because I can move at my own pace and I don't have to worry about really intricate coordination and communication for simple tasks. I was able to play around with bootstrap for the mini project and I'm happy with how it turned out. I can definitely still improve user experience with my navigation. I tend to route in a round about way if the project is complex. Hopefully I'll get better at that with practice.

tuesday - friday project

I enjoyed the back-end project. I think I could have paced myself better because I worked really hard on tuesday then I was a little bored and unsure of what to do thursday and friday afternoon. I was also frustrated by the number of things we had to implement that we did not learn in class. I can understand that we will not know everything when we graduate so it is important to be able to figure things out that we didn't learn at all but it was very challenging. Other than that I had a pretty fun and successful week. It was satisfying to see the site finally come together. There are still a few things that I could improve or add but I have met the requirements and I am a little burned out on the project after a day and a half of making minor adjustments.

week overview

I prefer project weeks to teaching weeks because we can deal with more complex problems but it is definitely difficult. I look forward to Monday's presentations so that I can see how everyone else's projects came out. I like back-end a lot more than I thought that I would after this week and I'm leaning much more toward being a full stack dev at a smaller company than purely front-end at the larger company.